The other day, I saw a car of a new type on the road. It looked very different from other vehicles released from the automaker. As I was interested in it, I visited the website and found it was one of the newly-released electric vehicles.

In recent years, more and more *eco-cars have been seen on the streets. When we say "eco-cars," we usually mean the electric vehicle(EV) or the plug-in hybrid vehicle(PHV).

((1)) One is the fuel cell vehicle(FCV), which is powered by hydrogen fuel cells so that it doesn't emit toxic substances in the environment. (2) For this reason, it is thought to be the most ecological vehicle now. Though it has already been developed, it has not been on the market yet. The other is called the clean diesel car. As the word "clean" shows, it is fuel-efficient and emits much less CO₂ as compared with gasoline vehicles. In addition, it is economical since the diesel fuel price is lower than that of gasoline. Currently, it is more popular in the European countries than in Japan. However, since some Japanese automakers released new models in 2012, it has been selling more and more. Last year, about 80,000 cars were sold within the country.

Then how about the other two? In the three months between April and June of this year, 7,750 EVs/PHVs were sold in our country, which was just about half as many as in the U.S., where they were sold the most. (3) China, whose government made a strong effort towards the widespread use of eco-cars as a measure against air pollution, ranked in the second place, followed by the U.K. and Norway. Japan was left behind these four countries.

Japan has led in developing and manufacturing eco-cars. It is said to be a leader of eco-cars in some points. Firstly, there are many types of eco-cars sold in Japan. Secondly, the government has promoted the tax-cut policies on holding eco-cars. Also Japan offers plenty of battery-charging facilities all over the country. I have seen a parking lot of a popular coffee chain equipped with one. All is set for (4)the new age of automobile society. To contribute to the prevention of global warming, it's time for each consumer to think about what he or she can do.
